cannet ('kænɪt). Her. [a. F. canette, dim. of cane duck.] A duck, borne as a charge, without feet or bill.

cannibal[1] ('kænɪbəl). Forms: 6-8 canibal, 6-7 caniball(e, cannibal, 7 cannabal, 7- cannibal. [In 16th c. pl. Canibales, a. Sp. Canibales, originally one of the forms of the ethnic name Carib or Caribes, a fierce nation of the West Indies, who are recorded to have been anthropophagi, and from whom the name was subsequently extended as a descriptive term.

Professor J. H. Trumbull, of Hartford, has pointed out that l, n, r interchange dialectally in American languages, whence the variant forms Caniba, Caribe, Galibi: and that Columbus's first representation of the name as he heard it from the Cubans was Canibales, explained as 'los de Caniba or Canima'; when he landed on Hayti, he heard the name of the people as Caribes and their country Carib; the latter was afterwards identified with Puerto Rico, named by the Spaniards 'Isla de Carib', 'which in some islands', Columbus says, 'they call Caniba, but in Hayti Carib'. Apparently, however, it was only foreigners who made a place-name out of that of the people: according to Oviedo (Hist. Gen. II. viii.) caribe signifies 'brave and daring', with which Prof. Trumbull compares the Tupi caryba 'superior man, hero, vir'. CALIB-AN is app. another variant = carib-an; cf. Galibi above-mentioned.

Columbus's notion on hearing of Caniba was to associate the name with the Grand Khan, whose dominions he believed to be not far distant; he held 'que Caniba no es otra cosa sino la gente del Gran Can'. To connect the name with Sp. can, It. cane, L. canis dog, was a later delusion, entertained by Geraldini, Bp. of San Domingo, 1521-5; it naturally tickled the etymological fancy of the 16th c., and may have helped to perpetuate the particular form canibal in association with the sense anthropophagi. See Prof. Trumbull's article, in N. & Q. Ser. v. IV. 171.]

2. A small light sort of boat or skiff propelled by paddling, used chiefly for recreation in Europe, North America, etc.

The ordinary canoe is made of thin board, galvanized iron, caoutchouc, paper, etc., and like the kayak of the Eskimoes is covered in, except the small space occupied by the canoeist; it is propelled by a paddle having a blade at each end; but so-called 'Indian' or 'Canadian canoes', which are open, and hold several persons, are also in use as pleasure-boats, and are propelled by a single-bladed paddle.

When this was subsequently influenced by French of Paris, the central Fr. chanoine was represented in Eng. by chanun, chanoun, so common in 14–15th c. But canon reappeared in the 16th c. and is the surviving form, running together with the preceding CANON sb.[1], so that many dictionaries treat the two as one word.]

1. Eccl. Hist. A clergyman (including clerks in minor orders) living with others in a clergy-house (claustrum), or (in later times) in one of the houses within the precinct or close of a cathedral or collegiate church, and ordering his life according to the canons or rules of the church. This practice of the canonica vita or canonical life began to prevail in the 8th c.; in the 11th c. it was, in some churches, reformed by the adoption of a rule (based upon a practice mentioned by St. Augustine) that clergymen so living together should renounce private property: those who embraced this rule were known as Augustinian (Austin) or regular, the others were secular canons.

From the 'regular' canons, came in the 12th c. those who followed the still stricter rule of Norbert of Premontré, thence called Premonstratensian Canons. These two groups of 'canons regular' were popularly distinguished by the colour of their habits as Black Canons and White Canons. As these vied, in strictness of living, with the monastic orders, the difference between a canon regular and a monk, became in the later Middle Ages (as now in the R.C. Ch.) so slight that the one is frequently confounded with the other. Thus Littré explains 'Augustinian Canons' as 'moines, dits aussi hermites de Saint-Augustin'.

2. In the Church of England, since the Reformation, all the canons have been secular, and the system of canons has been retained mainly in connexion with cathedral churches, where the canons, with the dean at their head, constitute the body of resident ecclesiastical dignitaries, who manage the cathedral, and (formally) elect the bishop. (See CHAPTER.)

The name of minor or petty canons is now sometimes given to those clergymen of the cathedral establishment who assist in performing the daily service, but are not members of the chapter. honorary canons, are titular members of the cathedral chapter, who are non-residentiary, and receive no emoluments. See also PREBENDARY.

cant (kænt), sb.[3] [This and its accompanying vb. presumably represent L. cant-us singing, song, chant (Pr. and NFr. cant, Fr. chant), cantā-re NFr. canter) to sing, chant; but the details of the derivation and development of sense are unknown.

Cantare and its Romanic representatives were used contemptuously in reference to the church services as early as 1183, when according to Rigord (c 1200) Gest Philip. August. (1818) 11, the Cotarelli of the Bourges country 'sacerdotes et viros religiosos captos secum ducentes, et irrisorie cantores ipsos vocantes, in ipsis tormentis subsannando dicebant: Cantate nobis, cantores, cantate; et confestim dabant eis alapas, vel cum grossis virgis turpiter cædebant'. So far as the evidence shows, tbe vb. appears in Eng. first applied to the tones and language of beggars, 'the canting crew': this, which according to Harman was introduced c 1540, may have come down from the religious mendicants; or the word may have been actually made from Lat. or Romanic in the rogues' jargon of the time. The subsequent development assumed in the arrangement of the verb is quite natural, though not actually established. Some have bowever conjectured that cant is the Irish and Gaelic cainnt (pronounced kantj, or nearly kantʃ) 'language'. And as early as 1711 the word was asserted to be derived from the name of Andrew Cant or his son Alexander Cant, Presbyterian ministers of the 17th c. This perhaps means that the surname of the two Cants was occasionally associated derisively with canting. The arrangement of the sb. here is tentative, and founded mainly on that of the vb., which appears on the whole earlier.]

cant (kænt), sb.[4] [Goes with CANT v.[4] The sb. (if not immediately from the vb.) may be an aphetic form of encant*, or acant*, a. OF. encant, mod.F. encan (Pr. encant, Sp. encanto, It. incanto), in same sense: of disputed origin. The loss of the initial syllable is found also in MHG. and mod.G. gant in same sense.

Diez takes the Romanic words as repr. L. in quantum 'to how much?' as the cry of the auctioneer; and with this agree the occas. med.L. form inquantus, Pr. enquant, and OF. inquant, and med.L. vb. inquantare. But no forms of the word appear to go back before the end of the 12th c.; the earliest and ordinary forms in med.L. were incantus (4th decl.), incantum, incantare, accantare, incantator, accantator; and OF. had enchanteur, enchantement (already in Assizes of Jerusalem). These show that the word was then identified with the Lat. incantare, accantare, derivs. of cantare to sing, in the sense of 'proclaim, cry'. Cf. Du Cange, under date 1351, 'quod incantator publicus dicti castri.. debeat facere proclamationem', and the illustrative 'jussit ergo Moyses praeconis voce cantari'. M. Paul Meyer thinks the identification with cantare too old and general to be explained as an error; and that there is more ground for treating the connexion with in quantum as a later fancy. Cf. also the mod.Fr. vendre a la criée to sell by auction, and the Sc. and north. Eng. roup, cry, shout, auction, 'selling of goods by an outcry' (Phillips 1678).]

cant (kænt), a. Sc. and north. dial. Also 4–6 kant, 5 kaunt. [Common in early times (13–14th c.) in the allit. phrase 'kant and keen'. App. the same word as mod.Du. kant 'neat, clever', in phr. kant en klaar quite ready; also East Fris. kant; considered by Franck to have been developed out of the sb. kant edge, etc. (see CANT sb.[1]); cf. the connexion of idea in 'keen' and 'edge'. The actual historical relation between the Low German and the northern English word does not appear. Hence CANTY, Flem. and LG. kantig.]

cantilever ('kæntɪli:və(r)). Also 7 candi-, 7-9 canti-, 8-9 cantaliver, 8 cantaliever, 8-9 cantalever. [The spelling candilever found in the 17th c. (if of any authority) compared with the Sp. 'can debaxo de la viga, mutilus super quem capita trabium imponuntur, a corbel in masonry' (Minsheu Voc. Hisp. 1617), naturally suggests some such Sp. phrase as can de llevar, 'modillion for carrying or bearing': but of this there is actually no trace. On the other hand the name 'flying lever bridge' used in A treatise on Bridge-building by T. Pope, New York, 1811, for what is now called a 'cantilever bridge', and the term 'framed lever' used for cantilever in Tredgold's Carpentry 1828, indicate that lever in its ordinary mechanical sense, is part of the word. For the first part we then think of CANT sb.[1], but as to the meaning in which that word might be here used, or the nature of the combination in canti-lever or canta-lever, no satisfactory suggestion can be offered. The word has entered into most of the European langs.

The spelling canvas, with one s, plural canvases (cf. atlases) is, it will be seen, more etymological than canvass, and now predominates; this spelling is also better used in the verb with the literal sense of 'furnish or line with canvas', whence canvased, canvasing; but the old derivative verb with sense 'to toss in a sheet, discuss, debate, solicit votes', is now always spelt CANVASS, and this spelling is retained in the verbal sb. in turn derived from it, as 'the electoral canvass'.]

canvass, canvas ('kænvəs), v. Forms: 6 kanivas(se, kanvas, 6–7 canuas(e, canvase, canuasse, canvasse, (6 canvaze, canvisse, canuize, 7 canvise, canvize, canvace), 6–8 canvas, 6– canvass. [f. CANVAS sb., in its former spelling canvass, and some of its special senses. The development of senses 1–5 is plain enough, starting from the literal notion of 'toss in a sheet', whence 'shake up, toss to and fro (agitare), discuss, etc.; but that of the intrans. 6, which appears early, has not been explained. The two notions subsequently influenced each other, and produced connecting usages.

Johnson says 'from canvass as it signifies a sieve': cf. CANVAS sb. 2; but no clear example of the vb. in the literal sense 'sift or winnow' has occurred. Yet Cotgrave's explanation of F. vanner 'to vanne or winnow.. also to course, chide, canuasse, bayt.. rake up scoffingly the faults or imperfections of others', affords an analogy for such a development; not so the case of berner 'to vanne or winnow corne, also to canuasse or tosse in a siue (a punishment)', which points to the development in 1–4 below. With Johnson's derivation agrees his explanation 'to try votes previously to the decisive act', but this is not historically the original sense of 6, and is either a conjectural explanation, or at most a mixing up of the notions of soliciting and of discussing or investigating. The trans. sense in 'to canvass the constituency' is quite late.]

1863-72 WATTS Dict. Chem. I. 739 Caoutchoucin..forms an excellent solvent for caoutchouc and other resins.

cap (kæp), sb.[1] Forms: 1 (cappa), cæppe, 3 keppe, 4–6 cappe, (5 cape), 5–7 capp, 6– cap. [OE. cæppe, a. late L. cappa 'cap' (It. cappa, Pr., Sp., Pg. capa, ONF. and Picard cape, F. chape, all meaning 'cloak, cape, or cope'). Isidore, a. 636, has (XIX. xxxi. 3, De ornamentis capitis feminarum) 'cappa..quia capitis ornamentum est'; Diez cites cappa from a document of 660, and an ancient gloss 'cappa mitra'. Med.L. used indiscriminately cappa and capa (the latter, however, much more frequently), and commonly in the sense of 'cloak, cope'; Chron. Treverti anno 1146, has 'caracalla (i.e. a long cloak with a hood) quam nunc capam vocamus'. The presumption is that the name was transferred from a woman's cap, hood, or head-covering, as Isidore used it, to the 'hood' of a cloak, and then to a cloak or 'cape' having such a hood, and thus to a priest's 'cope'. The sense 'head-covering, cap, hat' was at an early period in Romanic appropriated by the dim. cappellum, -ellus, in It. cappello, Sp. capelo, Pr. capel, OF. capel, chapel, F. chapeau, 'hat'. (The sense 'little or short cloak' was retained by the fem. dim. cappella, capella, It. cappella, Pr., Pg. capella, Sp. capilla, ONF. capelle, F. chapelle, until this received the curiously transferred sense CHAPEL, q.v.)

An explanation of capa, from capere to take, 'quia quasi totum capiat hominem' (because it takes as it were the whole man) is erroneously cited by Du Cange, and many after him, from Isidore. It is really from Papias c 1053; and is manifestly a 'popular etymology' of a late age, after the application had passed from 'cap' to 'cloak with a hood'. (Mahn thinks that cappa may be of Iberian origin.) The evidence of OE. is important, since it points to two distinct L. types, viz. cappa (which gave cæppe, cappe, cap), and cāpa which gave cāpe, cōpe; the latter is also witnessed by Icel. kápa 'cowled cloak, cloak with a hood': see COPE.

It looks as if cappa, the living Romanic form, was first adopted in Eng. (say from Italy) in its 7th c. sense, and gave cæppe, and that at a later time cāpa, so common in med.L., was introduced specially for the ecclesiastical dress. The latter is not actually evidenced in OE., but it occurs in Layamon, and was in the language early enough to undergo the phonetic change of OE. ā into ME. ō. OHG. (late) had chappa 'cloak with a hood'; so MHG. kappe, MDu. cappe (both rarely in sense 'cap'); modG. kappe, Du. kap 'cap'.

Words to be distinguished are (1) Cap, OE. cæppe, L. cappa; (2) Cap, Sc. dial. form of cop (like tap, stap, for top, stop); (3) Cape, early ME. form of cope, retained in north. dial. and Sc. as cape, caip (cf. early ME. and north. pape, Sc. paip = pope); (4) Cape, mod.Eng., from F. cape, Sp. capa cloak, the same word in origin as 3, but re-introduced in a new connexion; (5) Cape, F. cap, It. capo headland; (6) Cop, OE. cop, copp top, summit, also cup; (7) Cope, early ME. cāpe, Icel. kápa, L. cāpa. In ME. cape also occasionally appears for cappe, cap.]

The Fr. cabestan is not known to us earlier than Palsgr. 1530; since the word occurs in Eng. in 14th c., it may have been learned from the shipmen of Marseilles or Barcelona at the time of the Crusades. In Pg., capistrum and its derivatives have the r transposed, cabresto 'halter', nautically 'ropes, cables belonging to the bowsprit', cabresteiro 'halter-maker', cabrestante; the last is also the approved form in mod. literary Sp.; this form gave rise to the untenable conjecture that the derivation was from cabra goat + estante 'standing', ingeniously supported by the known application of the name of the goat in various languages (cabria, chèvre, bock, etc.), to various mechanical devices. The attempt to find a meaning in the word, in English, produced many popular perversions of the second element, as stain, stone, stand, stall, stern, storm, string. Other names were capstock, and cablestock.]

1. a. A piece of mechanism, working on the principle of the wheel and axle, on a vertical axis, the power being applied by movable bars or levers inserted in horizontal sockets made round the top, and pushed by men walking round, whereby the apparatus is made to revolve and wind up a cable round its cylinder or barrel; it is used especially on board ship for weighing the anchor, also for hoisting heavy sails, etc., and for raising weights out of quarries, mines, coal-pits (see GIN), and the like.

double capstan, one that has two barrels on different decks, so as to be worked by two sets of men. Phrases, to heave at the capstan, to man the capstan, to bring the cable to the capstan; to rig the capstan, to insert the bars, etc.; to pawl the capstan, to drop the pawls or catches into their sockets so as to prevent recoil, when heaving is stopped; to come up the capstan, to slacken the cable by lifting out the pawls and walking back; to surge the capstan, to slacken the rope while heaving so as to prevent riding or fouling.

carbinol ('kɑ:bɪnɒl). Chem. [f. CARBON sb. + -OL (the ending of alcohol, used to indicate an analogous compound).] A generic name introduced by Kolbe c 1868 for the monatomic alcohols.

Simple Carbinol is methyl alcohol or wood spirit (taken as $COH.H_3$), a compound of 1 atom of carbon with 1 of hydroxyl OH, and 3 of replaceable hydrogen, any one or more of which may be replaced by the same number of alcohol radicals, the name or names of which are prefixed. When only one hydrogen atom is replaced, the carbinol is a 'primary alcohol', as methyl carbinol $COH.H_2.CH_3$ = ethyl or ordinary alcohol, C_2H_5OH; ethyl carbinol $COH.H_2.C_2H_5$ = propyl alcohol C_3H_7OH. When two atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'secondary alcohols' as dimethyl carbinol $COH.H.(CH_3)_2$ = secondary propyl alcohol C_3H_8O; methyl-propyl-carbinol $COH.H.CH_3.C_3H_7$. When all three atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'tertiary alcohols', as trimethyl carbinol $COH.(CH_3)_3$ = tertiary butyl alcohol $C_4H_{10}OH$, dimethyl-ethyl-carbinol $COH.(CH_3)_2.C_2H_5$. The nomenclature of the complicated members as carbinols is more simple and definite than as alcohols.

carbinyl ('kɑ:bɪnɪl). Chem. [f. CARBON sb. + -YL, as in ethyl, etc.] A term for the alcohol radicals of the corresponding carbinols, as dimethyl carbinyl iodide $C(CH_3)_2{\cdot}H{\cdot}I$. (Watts.)

1. Chem. A salt of carbonic acid, a chemical compound formed by the union of carbonic acid with a base or basic oxide. These constitute a very numerous class of bodies, some of which, e.g. Carbonate of lime, $CaCO_3$, exist in great quantities in nature.

Since carbonic acid (the hydrate), $CH_2O_3 = 2HO.CO$, contains two atoms of replaceable hydrogen, there exist two sets of carbonates, viz. normal carbonates in which both atoms of H are replaced by a metal, and hydrogen carbonates, in which only one atom of H is so replaced. Thus normal sodium carbonate (carbonate of soda) $2NaO.CO$, hydrogen sodium carbonate (bicarbonate of soda) $HO.NaO.CO$.

1. (Formerly often more fully carbuncle-stone): A name variously applied to precious stones of a red or fiery colour; the carbuncles of the ancients (of which Pliny describes twelve varieties) were probably sapphires, spinels or rubies, and garnets; in the Middle Ages and later, besides being a name for the ruby, the term was esp. applied to a mythical gem said to emit a light in the dark; in mod. lapidary work the term is applied to the garnet when cut en cabochon, or of a boss form, usually hollowed out to allow the colour of the stone to be seen.

carcass, carcase ('kɑ:kəs), sb. Forms: α. 4 carcays, karkeis, 4–6 carcas, 5 carkoys, 5–6 carkes, 5–7 carkeis, -keys, -kas. β. 6 carkace, carckesse, karkaise, 6–7 karcasse, carcasse, -kasse, -kesse, -keise, 7 -caise, -kase, karcase, 7–8 carkass, 8 carkess, 6– carcase, 7– carcass. [Of this we have two types: α. ME. carkoys, -cays, -keis (which survived to 16th c. and even to 1611 as carkeis, -eys), a. Anglo F. carcois, carcas (in Central OF. charcos, charcois, charchois, charquois, still dial. in W. of France) answering to med.L. carcosium (see Du Cange and quot. 1450 in sense 1); β. 16th c. carcasse, later carcase, carcass, a. 16th e. Fr. carcasse, ad. It. carcassa (Pg. carcassa, Sp. carcasa) 'carcass'. The 16–17th c. forms carkaise, -keise, -kesse, are app. a mixture of α and β. In mod. spelling carcass and carcase are almost equally common: the Dictionaries from Bailey and Johnson downward give carcass alone or by preference.

(The ulterior etymology presents many difficulties: see Diez, Littré, Scheler, Skeat. It is to be noted however that OF. carcois, med.L. carcosium, must app. be separated from OF. tarquais quiver (repr. med.Gr. ταρκάσιον, evidently ad. Pers. (Arab., Turk. tarkash quiver, arrow-case), although some confusion of the two words may be suspected in mod.F. carquois (since 15th c.), It. carcasso and turcasso, Pg. carcaz quiver. M. Paul Meyer thinks it must also be separated from the 17th c. F. carquois in sense 'mast-head', repr. L. carchēsium. But the actual derivation of carcosium, carcassa, and their mutual relation remains quite uncertain. Diez's suggestion of L. caro flesh, and It. casso chest, breast, or cassa case, trunk, is untenable for carcosium, and not very likely for carcassa.]

Gr. χάρτης leaf of papyrus, leaf, thin plate; perh. of Egyptian origin. (It does not appear how the Eng. form came to be carde, instead of carte, which was established in Sc.)

The native Fr. repr. of L. carta was charte; after the introduction of carte from Ital. it was gradually extended to other senses, belonging to charte (as in charte blanche), or to med.L., It., or Sp. carta, as those of map, chart, card. The Eng. word has had a parallel history; the shape and stiffness of a playing-card being generally present to mind in the later extensions of the word.]

The specific applications in Eng. (found also in other mod. European langs.) follow those of the Latin word (classical or post-classical). The analogy of cardinal winds (L. venti cardinales), whence cardinal points, etc., led to a certain association of the adj. with the number four, as in cardinal virtues, cardinal humours.]

I. From fig. uses of the Latin adj.

1. a. gen. On which something else hinges or depends, fundamental; chief, principal, of special importance. (Almost always of abstract things.)

L. PIKE Phonetics vii. 137 Jones's 'cardinal vowel' scheme is perhaps the most convenient and objective classification.

2. a. cardinal virtues (Lat. virtutes cardinales): in scholastic philosophy, justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, accounted the four chief 'natural' virtues as distinguished from the 'theological' virtues of faith, hope, and charity. †'cargo, sb.[2] Obs. [Both of the following uses seem explicable from the senses of the Sp. cargo, carga burden, load, weight, bundle, fardle, truss, etc.; but they appear earlier than the prec., and have no contact with it in Eng.

There is however no evidence that cargo was so used in Sp. The suggestion that the exclamation was meant for the Sp. ca'rājo, appears phonetically out of the question, as does that of its being for It. coraggio (ko'raddʒo).]

carnation[3] (kɑː'neɪʃən). Also 6 incarnacyon, coron-, cornation. [Some 16th c. authors give one form of the name as coronation, apparently from its 16th c. specific name, Betonica coronaria, in allusion to its use in chaplets (cf. CAMPION), or from 'the floures..dented or toothed aboue..like to a littell crownet' (Lyte). On the other hand, Turner calls the plant an incarnacyon, Lyte has carnation as well as coronation, and Gerarde expressly identifies it with the colour 'carnation'. Prior takes coronation as the original form, and Britten and Holland think his opinion 'probably correct'.

One or other name must have been due to popular mistake; carnation is alone found after 1600, and has apparently even modified the later application of 'carnation' as a colour-name: the flower, however, is not always of this colour: as Lyte says, 'some be of colour white, some carnation or of a liuely flesshe colour, some be of a cleare or bright redde, some of a darke or deepe redde, and some speckled'.]

carnival ('kɑ:nɪvəl). Forms: 6 carnoval, carnevale, 7 carnevall, carnivall, 7–8 carnaval, 7– carnival. [a. It. carnevale, carnovale (whence F. carnaval), evidently related to the med.L. (11–12th c.) names carnelevārium, carnilevāria, carnilevāmen, cited by Carpentier in additions to Du Cange. These appear to originate in a L. carnem levāre*, or It. carne levare* (with infinitive used subst. as in il levar del sole sunrise), meaning 'the putting away or removal of flesh (as food)', the name being originally proper to the eve of Ash Wednesday. The actual It. carnevale appears to have come through the intermediate carnelevale, cited by Carpentier from a document of 1130.

The history of the word is illustrated by the parallel med.L. name carnem laxare (cited by Carpentier from a charter of 1050), corresp. to It. carne lasciare* 'leaving or forsaking flesh', whence, app. by contraction, the modern carnasciale = carnevale. Carnem laxare, carne lasciare*, carnelasciale*, carnasciale, form a series exactly parallel to carnem levare*, carne levare*, carnelevale, carnevale. Other names having a similar reference are, for Shrove Tuesday, carnicapium 'flesh-taking', and carnivora [dies]; for Lent or its beginning, carniprivium, carnisprivium, privicarnium, f privare to deprive. In all these, 'flesh' means meat, and that it was understood to mean the same in carnelevare is shown by many early quotations in Du Cange; e.g. in a MS. of beg. of 13th c. 'De ludo Carnelevar. In Dominica dimissionis carnis,' etc. Also 'Dominica ad vel ante carnes tollendas'; with which compare the Spanish carnes tolendas, 'shrove-tide'. We must therefore entirely reject the suggestion founded on another sense of levare, 'to relieve, ease', that carnelevarium meant 'the solace of the flesh (i.e. body)' before the austerities of Lent. The explanations 'farewell flesh, farewell to flesh' (from L. vale) found already in Florio, and 'down with flesh!' (from F. aval), belong to the domain of popular etymology. (Cf. Dr. Chance in N. & Q. s. 7 IV. 82.)]

Originally (according to Tommaseo and Bellini) 'the day preceding the first of Lent'; commonly extended to the last three days or the whole week before Lent; in France it comprises Jeudi gras, Dimanche gras, Lundi gras and Mardi gras, i.e. Thursday before Quinquagesima, Quinquagesima Sunday, Monday, and Shrove Tuesday; in a still wider sense it includes 'the time of entertainments intervening between 'Twelfth-day' (or Boxing Day) and Ash Wednesday' (Littré).

Mid Lent Carnival (Carnaval de la mi-carême): a festivity held on the middle Thursday of Lent, to celebrate the fact that the first half of that season is at an end.

carol ('kærəl), sb. Forms: 4–6 karol(e, karolle, carole, 4–7 caroll(e, 4–9 carrol(l, 5 (careld), caroul, 5–6 caral(le, carowl, 6 carralle, caril, caryl, carrell, karrel, 7 karil, (carrold), 4- carol. [a. OF. carole, also kar-, char-, quar-, quer-, kerole, -olle, in all the senses in which it occurs in Eng. (exc. 3); still in French dialects. (Marne carole dance, fête, joy; Swiss Rom. coraula, coraulo, round dance, dance-song, coraul ball, round dance (Godef.), Pr. and It. carola; Old Pr. also corola. The ulterior etymology of OF. carole and its aecompanying vb. caroler, is uncertain; nor is it clear whether the vb. or the sb. takes priority etymologically. There are many indications that the first syllable had originally co- (see Diez, 1878, p. 539, and cf. the Swiss and Breton forms); hence Romanic etymologists generally agree with Diez, in seeking the etymology in the Gr.-L. chorus, and its derivatives chorēa, choraules, etc.: cf. esp. 'corolar vel coreiar, coreas ducere' quoted by Diez from Faidit Gram. Prov., of 13th c. Wackernagel would take the vb. (coraulare 'conculcare' to trcad, dance, Ugutio) as a derivative of thc sb. coraula, choraula, choraules, the fluteplayer who accompanied the chorus dance, and the sb. as a derivative of the vb. Another conjecture, assuming 'ring' to be the original sense of the sb., has proposed as its source L. corolla 'little erown, coronet, garland'. In any case, a Celtic origin is out of the question: Welsh carol (Christmas) carol, and vb. caroli to sing carols, are from English (Rhŷs), and Breton koroll dance, korolli to danee, koroller dancer, are from French. The arrangement of the senses here followed is tentativc.]

Florio has It. carpetta 'a carpet for a table'; mod.Ital. dicts. carpita a coarse carpet; La Crusca says 'a coarse hanging for a table, made of rough woollen materials, and of patches, of motley colours'.

Carpita is etymologically identical with F. charpie (Pic. carpie, Latinized carpia 13th c.) 'lint (for surgical purposes) procured by the unravelling of old linen,' the pa. pple. fem. of OF. charpir to card wool, to unravel cloth & reduce it to threads, to tear to shreds, corresp. to It. carpire, pa. pple. carpito, representing (with change of conjugation) L. carpĕre to card, pick, pluck, tear, pull in pieces. The name carpita may have been originally given to a fabric formed of unravelled cloth, or of shreds of cloth patched together. The variants carpeta, carpetta also occur in later med.L., doubtless from Italian carpetta, which assumes the form of a diminutive.]

(ii) Physics. An electron, atom, or group carrying an electric charge.

1901 RUTHERFORD in Phil. Mag. IV. 20 Excited radio-activity is due to the conveyance of radioactive matter of some kind on positively charged carriers, which travel through the air in an electric field.

(iii) spec. In a semi-conducting material: any of the mobile electrons or holes which carry charges.

1939 A. H. WILSON Semi-conductors & Metals iv. 47 Since the 'holes' behave in many ways like positive electrons, this question can be settled by measuring any quantity which depends on the first power of the charge of the carrier. 1945 Jrnl. Appl. Physics XVI. 564/2 Such 'holes' will give rise to a conductivity described by Eqs. (1)-(3) but the sign of the charge carriers will appear to be positive. 1946 Chem. Plant Path. xvi. 319 A virus may exist in a plant without causing any external evidence of its presence, and such symptomless 'carriers' may yield the virus to insects feeding upon them. 1955 GAIGER & DAVIES Vet. Path. & Bacteriol. (ed. 4) vii. 152 Convalescent animals are often carriers... In some diseases ..the carrier state may remain for years and the animal becomes a danger to other susceptible animals.

(ii) Genetics. An organism that has a recessive gene for some genetic characteristic (as a hereditary disease) and so can pass the characteristic on to a descendant although not itself showing it.

1933 Brit. Jrnl. Psychol. July 7 An intermediate type of inheritance of mental defect in which the heterozygote or 'carrier' is recognizable as a dull person. 1944 DARLINGTON in Nature 5 Aug. 167/1 Viruses..[are] suppressed by some host genotypes and permitted by others... An earlier L. carricare in sense of 'load', became carcare, cargare, whence OF. charchier, chargier: see CHARGE. After this, was formed a new carricāre in sense of 'transport in a cart', which gave OF. carier, charier. Ultimately therefore carry has the same etymology as CARK, CHARGE, and CARGO.]

From the radical meaning which includes at once 'to remove or transport', and 'to support or bear up', arise two main divisions, in one of which (I.) 'removal' is the chief notion, and 'support' may be eliminated, as in 4, 5, and several of the fig. senses; while in the other II.) 'support' is tbe prominent notion, and 'motion' (though usually retained) may entirely disappear. Cf. 'Do not leave the carpet-bag here; carry it up stairs', with 'Do not drag it along the floor; carry it'. For the former take is now largely substituted.

carsay, carsey, obs. ff. of KERSEY.

carse (kɑ:s, Sc. kɛrs). Sc. Forms: 4 kerss, 6 cars, 7- carse. [Of uncertain derivation, but perhaps the same word as carres, carrs, cars, pl. of CARR sb.[2] fen, low wet land.

This suits the sense: the early quotations speak of the kerss as full of pools and mires: Trivet describes the Carse of Falkirk in the time of Edwd. I. as loca palustria (Jam.). The suppression of the vowel of the plural is phonetically regular, and the retention of the (s) sound instead of its change to (z) is seen also in pence, dice, mice, truce (the latter also, like carse, made into a singular). Cf. also the change of Pieres, Peres to Piers, Pierce. The difficulty is that no early examples of kerris or carres are found in Sc.: in Barbour the word is already kerss. The Welsh cors 'marsh' suits the sense, but presents a difficulty in the vowel, as well as in the geographical localization of the word.]

The stretch of low alluvial land along the banks of some Scottish rivers:

'Thus all the flat lands, on the north side of Tay, between Perth and Dundee, are called the Carse of Gowrie; those on the Forth, the Carse of Stirling, and the Carse of Falkirk' (Jam.). The name appears to have originally referred to their wet fenny character, but is now associated with their rich fertility.

cart (kɑːt), sb. Forms: 3–7 carte, (3 karte, 3–4 kart), 6 (charte), Sc. cairt, 3– cart. [OE., had cræt neut., pl. cratu, app. related to Du. krat neut. 'hind part of a cart' (which is, however, only mod.Du. and suspected to be of recent adoption). Some compare OHG. cratto, crezzo, masc., MHG. kratte, kretze (m. and f.) basket, hamper, panier, mod.G. dial. krätze fem., basket (cf. CRATE), and suppose that OE. cræt was prop. a cart of basketwork, but of this there is no actual evidence. ON. had kart-r masc. 'cart', generally considered to be cognate with the OE. word; and since the ME. was always cart(e, and never crat, its direct source appears to have been the ON., rather than the OE. word.

If ME. cart(e had merely arisen by metathesis of r from OE. cræt, we should expect some overlapping of forms as in the case of brid, bird; one may note, however, that OE. crætwán exists in mod. Welsh as cartwen. Cart has entered from Eng. into most of the Celtic langs.; but is there palpably a foreign word.]

L. carrūca (f. carr-us CAR) was originally 'a sort of state coach or chariot'; this sense is still found anno 700 'carruca in qua sedere consuevi' (see Diez); but in Gaul it was early applied to the wheel-plough, in which sense carruca, carruga, carrua appear in the Salic and Allemannic Laws. Cf. the s.w. Eng. plough = 'wagon'.]

A measure of land, varying with the nature of the soil, etc., being as much as could be tilled with one plough (with its team of 8 oxen) in a year; a plough-land.

The acreage of the carucate varied according to the system of tillage. If the land lay in three arable common fields the carucate, according to Fleta, contained 180 acres; 60 for fallow, 60 for winter corn, and 60 for spring corn. If the land lay in 2 fields the carucate consisted of 160 acres, 80 for fallow, and 80 for tillage. Commonly only the land under plough in any one year was reckoned, the fallow being thrown into common pasturage. Hence in ancient deeds the normal carucate is either 120 acres or 80 acres by the Norman number (5 score to the hundred) and 144 acres or 96 acres by the English number (6 score to the hundred). —*Rev. An instrument of torture, said to have been invented by the 'Master of Orkney' in 1596. Its action appears to have been forcibly to draw together the body and limbs of the victim, and hold him in this cramped position.

(An unlucky 'shot' at a derivation, hazarded by Dr. Jamieson ['It might be deduced from Teut. kausse, kousse (Fr. chausse) a stocking, and lauw tepidus q. the warm hose'], although absolutely pre-scientific and worthless, is the sole foundation for the imaginary description of this 'frightful machine', adopted by Mr. Lecky, *Hist. 7. case of conscience: A practical question concerning which conscience may be in doubt; a question as to the application of recognized principles of faith and obedience to one's duty in a particular case or set of circumstances.

A transl. of L. casus conscientiæ (F. cas de conscience), according to Ames (1576–1633), 'called casus, because it is wont to happen or occur (cadere) in life; and casus conscientiæ, because when it happens, conscience ought to give a judgement with the greatest carefulness'. These cases or questions are divided into two classes, (1) those which concern a man's state before God, (2) those which concern his actions in that state. It is mainly to the second of these, or cases of conduct, that CASUISTRY is understood to refer.

9. Grammar. [L. cāsus used to translate Gr. πτῶσις lit. 'falling, fall'.

By Aristotle πτῶσις was applied to any derived, inflected, or extended form of the simple ὄτομα or ῥῆμα (i.e. the nominative of nouns, the present indicative of verbs), such as the oblique cases of nouns, the variations of adjectives due to gender and comparison, also the derived adverb (e.g. δικαίως was a πτῶσις of δίκαιος), the other tenses and moods of the verb, including also its interrogative form. The grammarians, following the Stoics, restricted πτῶσις to nouns, and included the nominative under the designation.]

a. In inflected languages, one of the varied forms of a substantive, adjective, or pronoun, which express the varied relations in which it may stand to some other word in the sentence, e.g. as subject or object of a verb, attribute to another noun, object of a preposition, etc. b. But as many modern languages have nearly or quite lost these variations of form, case is sometimes loosely used for the relation itself, whether indicated by distinct form or not.

Thus, by a mixture of the two notions, in modern English, substantives are commonly said to have three cases, nominative, objective, and possessive; the two former being merely relations, and the latter entirely formal; in modern French to have two (or three) cases, cas-sujet and cas-régime (the latter subdivided into direct and indirect), which are in the noun merely relations, while of the pronouns some retain only one case-form, some have four (e.g. ils, les, leur, eux). Thus also, in quot. 1824, 'nominative' case is loosely used for subject.

F. casaque 'a cassocke, mandilion, long coat', 16th c. in Littré, (corresp. to Sp. and Pg. casaca 'a souldiers cassocke, a frock, a horsemans coat', Minsheu, It. casacca 'a frocke, a horse-mans cote, a long cote; also a habitation or dwelling' Florio). The military use is the original; the ecclesiastical use appears to have arisen in English, in the 17th century.

If the It. is the original, and casacca 'cassock' the same word as casacca ' dwelling' (see above), then it is a deriv. of casa house (as if 'a garment that covers like a house': cf. CASULE, CHASUBLE); but the identification is doubtful. The Dict. de Trevoux suggests that casaque is a variant of Cosaque Cossack, from whom the military cassock might take its name. Lagarde (Götting. Gelehrte Anzeiger, 15 Apr. 1887, 238) maintains that F. casaque is a back-formation from casaquin (by incorrectly viewing the latter as a dimin. form), and that casaquin, It. casacchino, was a corruption of Arab. kazāyand, ad. Pers. kazhāyand, a padded jerkin, or acton, f. kazh = kaj raw silk, silk floss + āyand stuffed. The word kasagân actually occurs in MHG. as 'riding-cloak' ('reitrock' Schade), and gasygan in OF. as padded jerkin or vest' (Godef.), but the relation of these to casaquin and casaque has yet to be settled.]

3. A garment worn by clergymen.

a. A long close-fitting frock or tunic worn by Anglican clergymen, originally along with and under the gown; but, in recent times, also under the shortened surplice, and sometimes by 'High-Church' clergymen, like the soutane of Roman Catholic priests, apart from these vestments, as a kind of ecclesiastical garb. Also, sometimes worn by vergers, choristers, and others engaged in ecclesiastical functions. See quots.

In this sense, which appears to date from the Restoration, it seems to be the continuation of the scholar's cassock, in sense 2; it had probably some reference to the canon of 60 years before, requiring clergymen not to appear in public 'without coats or cassocks' (see sense 2).
